

listings, indicating that gains were made throughout the country.

LinkUp is a job search engine that only indexes job openings from over 20,000 company websites throughout the country. Because the index is updated daily and only includes job listings that are found on corporate career portals on company websites, the completely unique jobs data is extremely reliable. There are no jobs from recruiters, headhunters, search firms, or staffing companies, and no scam jobs, phishing jobs, 'money mule' ads, or other fraudulent postings. And because LinkUp only indexes jobs from a single source - the hiring company itself - there are no duplicate job listings that pollute job aggregators such as Indeed and Simplyhired.

In terms of jobs by category, new and total job listings also rose by 16% and 10% respectively, with approximately 70% of the 36 job categories showing gains in new and total jobs.

Given the near impossible task of predicting how many people will be counted as part of the labor market, there's virtually no way to predict what the unemployment rate will be. But for certain, the labor report on Friday will provide firm evidence that the jobs market improved substantially in January and the U.S. economy is, once again, adding jobs in a meaningful fashion.
